These joints determine the planes along which the rocks split easily, so that the face of a cliff may be vertical or overhanging, according to the angle of jointing. The loftiest and most precipitous slopes occur in rocks which are practically free from joints, as in the 3300-foot granite face of El Capitan in the Yosemite Valley. In the course of weathering small local differences in the quantity of cement in a rock are etched out into curious patterns of fretwork, as shown in Fig. 211. There is one law of universal application to sculptured surfaces, --the lardFig. 211.-E1 capitan. est survives.
